This doctoral dissertation was conceived of as a sub-project of the interdisciplinary research group “Waterscapes” at the Cluster of Excellence “Asia and Europe in a Global Context” at Heidelberg University. The project, which started in late 2013, was funded by the Cluster of Excellence Asia and Europe with financial resources from the DFG. Further funding came in the form of a scholarship from Tel Aviv University, respectively the Yad Hanadiv Foundation in 2017.

I am extremely grateful to the Cluster Asia and Europe for the continuous support that I received over the past years. I have benefited greatly from the provision of a stimulating research environment in the form of academic lectures, colloquia as well as the facilitation of several field research visits and not least from the social gatherings. My thanks here go especially to Oliver Lamers and Jule Nowotnick for their dedicated commitment and guidance. A big thank you also goes to the smart guys from the Cluster-IT for their technical support, especially in the case of several digital emergencies. My gratitude extends further to the staff of the South Asia Institute (SAI) of the University of Heidelberg, who equally made it possible to carry out this project in several ways, including offering a workspace, granting access to the research environment, especially to its outstanding library and other kind of organisational and scholarly assistance. I would particularly like to thank Julie Pusch, on the one hand for her administrative support, but also for her valuable help with the collection of material in the first phase of my thesis.

By giving me a platform to present my project, several conferences, seminars and workshops in Jaipur (India), Denpasar (Bali), Tel Aviv (Israel), Heidelberg (Germany) and Dehra Dun (India) have contributed significantly to the progress of my work. The lively exchange with other researchers not only broadened my intellectual horizon, but also helped me to (re)formulate and narrow down my research questions and to work out the final focus of my doctoral thesis. I would like to take this occasion to once again express my sincere thanks to the respective organisers and all others involved who made it possible for these events to take place. I am particularly indebted to B.K. Joshi and Maheshwar P. Joshi in Dehradun. At this point my gratitude goes as well to the colleagues of the “waterscapes” project, Annette Hornbacher, Markus Nüsser and Ravi Baghel, who facilitated several prolific opportunities to discuss and also publish facets of my research. My proof-reader Joe Hill should also be mentioned here, whose initially relentless toughness with me nevertheless led to a very satisfactory outcome with the publication of an excerpt of the dissertation in the form of a book chapter.

In Israel, my special thanks go to Udi Halperin and Asaf Goldschmidt for making my research stay there possible. I have benefited greatly from Udi Halperin's guidance and the ongoing fruitful conversations with him and will always remember his dedicated and helpful counselling. I would also like to express my gratitude to Galia Lavi, for her kind assistance in helping our group of scholars to gain ground in Tel Aviv. The same goes to Ricki Levi and Meny Vaknin for their friendship and for helping me to find my way around the University. I enjoyed having Kaiqi Hua as a dorm neighbour, which led to very entertaining conversations and me being impressed by his extraordinary views on the world and academia. I would like to sincerely thank Shrikant S. Bahulkar for taking the time to help me with some Sanskrit translations also at TAU, while at the same time introducing me to his extensive knowledge of historical India, in addition to letting me taste his excellent home-cooked, or rather dormitory-cooked, meals.

I have been blessed with wonderful companions on this journey and would like to thank them for their presence, friendship, lively exchanges and inspiring contributions. In Heidelberg, my grateful thoughts go especially to my dear friends and research colleagues Lea Stepan, Daniela Cappello and Vera Lazzaretti. My heartfelt thanks go to Rainer Leischner, who has so often selflessly and generously hosted me in his cosy attic in Heidelberg. I have profited greatly from the enriching conversations with my friend and—as I call him—“personal coach” since university days, Arno Dohmen. Many thanks to Hanna Werner who I first met on an arduous 12-hour taxi ride (for a distance of about 270 kilometres) from Delhi to our conference venue in Dehradun. Surviving such a journey together means you have inevitably become friends. She generously took the time to comment on several chapters of my dissertation, and the discussions we had helped me put the finishing touches on the work. I spent another—albeit much shorter—intellectually stimulating journey on a Shatabdi Express train from Haridwar to Delhi in 2017, where I by pure coincidence happened to sit next to Daniela Berti. This was all the more curious because a few months earlier in Israel, Udi Halperin had strongly recommended that I should get in touch with her. As it happened, we started chatting from the very first minute and thus spent the 4.5-hour trip exchanging ideas and experiences. Many thanks to Daniela for the interesting insights and for later sharing some of her notes from the field.

In India and Garhwal, I would like to express my gratitude first and foremost to Mahadev Prasad Pandey, whom I ran into right after getting off the public bus on my first visit to Kaliyasaur. M. P. spent so much of his precious time with me. He patiently and with much humour explained to me the peculiarities of the village culture of Uttarakhand and the village backgrounds of Dhari/Kaliyasaur. He was always ready to answer my questions, helped me with translations and became a good friend in the process. Thanks to him, I also became acquainted with many other of the wonderful people of Kaliyasaur and Dhari. I especially thank Bharat Jhunjhunwala and his wife Madhu who welcomed me with open arms in their house in Lakshmoli and provided me with a heap of valuable information and material about the background of the Srinagar Dam project. To Beena Chaudhary, her husband Bhopal and their son likewise many thanks for their hospitality and the interesting perspectives on their activism. On the same note, I wish to thank Anuj Joshi, Buddhi Ballabh Chamoli and the late Bhawani Shanker Thapliyal, as well as his wife Ganga Asnoda Thapliyal. The same gratitude extends to Vijay Bahuguna for sharing his historical and other expertise on Garhwal and keeping me updated to this day on what is going on at the dev bhūmi, and to D. R. Purohit for several interesting discussions during his stay at Heidelberg University. I also would like to express my gratitude to Gabi Jettmar-Thakur, who hosted me in Manali and widened my perspective on the Himalayan mountain society, as well as its transcendental beings, as did Gabi's friend Brigitte Luchesi in several written conversations in this regard. In this context, I would also like to pay special tribute to William S. Sax for his pioneering and very inspiring research in the Uttarakhand region, which became a solid basis for my work.

In Delhi, my appreciation goes in particular to Mukul Sharma and Nayanjot Lahiri for the thought-provoking exchanges of ideas, for providing insights into their work, and for background information of all kinds, especially on the political aspects of dams. I sincerely thank Vimal Bhai for introducing me to his courageous, inspiring and tireless work as an activist. I would also like to gratefully mention Elvira Graner, who mentored and advised me when she was in charge of the New Delhi Branch Office of the South Asia Institute at the time I started my research.

My heartfelt thanks to my supervisor Jörg Gengenagel for giving me the chance and the free hand to pursue my project, as well as providing me with significant support in word and deed on the way to completing this dissertation. I would also like to thank Karin Steiner for taking on the second mentorship, and the University of Würzburg, and the Faculty of Philosophy for accepting my dissertation. My gratitude likewise goes to my earlier mentor in Hamburg, Tatiana Oranskaia, who promoted me and encouraged me to embark on this journey.

Last but not least, I would like to thank my partner Martin, who has always accompanied and supported me through all the ups and downs with his loving kindness.
